The BLUE OCEAN'S DAUGHTER Cyrus Townsend Brady

Capt. Hiram Hubbell and his daughter.
Susan, whose mother is dead and who has lived entirely on her father's ship, often wearing, indeed, men's clothes, are bound for Boston on the ship Hiram and Susan. From Berdeaux. The crew turns out to be, a bad lot, especially the boatswain, Francois, who has been flogged for insuiting Susan. The only reliable man is the mate, Mr. Conant, who is secretly in love with the girl. They are attacked by a British frigate, the time being the American Revolution. During the engagement, Francois, staking advantage of the confusion, staking advantage of the confusion, stabs the captain in revenge for being flogged.

Lieut. Robert Mornington, R. N., is left with a prize crew to take the Hiram and Susan to England, the old crew and the mate being imprisoned forward. Mornington falls in love with Susan, and she partly forgets her loss in his society. While on deck one day, Susan perceives that Conant, who is also on deck, wants to communicate with her. She contrives that Conant, who is also on deck wants to let him pass her a note, and takes it to her cabin to read.

The note tells her of a plot to recapture the ship. She is to keep the lieutenant from getting on deck. That night Mornington proposes to her; hanging between leve and duty she puts him off with the promise that she will answer him next day. In the end, she locks him in his stateroom, and the ship is successfully recaptured. Mornington thinks that Susan has been hoodwinking him all the time, and refuses to listen to her explanation. Her grief makes her harsh Synopsis of Chapters Already Published | words being wasted in such an emer

Like every sea officer of the period, Mornington had a certain skill in rough-and-ready sailor surgery. He went first to the mate, bared his breast, and examined his wounds.

The brave American had been stabbed in a half-dozen places. His head had been beaten and bruised by fists and belaying-pins. A less strong man would have died long since, but the mate still survived, though his days were evidentsurvived, though his days were evidently numbered.
Susan washed the blood and dirt from his face while the lieutenant bandaged his wounds as best he could and stopped the flow of blood.
"Will he live, think you?" asked the girl. "No," said the Heutenant shortly; "'tis impossible."

"He was very good to me," she said softly, tears dropping upon his face.
"Yes," said the lieutenant, "he was a rough man, but brave."
"Will he recover consciousness, think

"I cannot tell."
"I should like him to know that I thank him and appreciate what he did."
"You may have your chance. Let us hope so," he returned, too magnanimous now to be jeal us of her evident interest in the face of swiftly approaching death.

They made the mate as comfortable as they could, and then went to the others.

They made the mate as comfortable as they could, and then went to the others.

One of the mutineers was plainly dying; the other might recover; the English sailor was in a serous way, but for him, too, there was a glimmer of hope.

"Tell me," said Susan to the dying mutineer, "what possessed you?"

"It was Francois," gasped the man; "him and the Greek. They told us we could seize the ship and take her into Algiers and sell the cargo, and make away in an open boal. We could say we'd been captured by the Rockingham and had recaptured the ship, and she had been wrecked, and so on."

"Thank God that I was able to come to your assistance!"

"You have saved my life, my honor-everything." said the girl.

"The man in the berth laughed.

"Go on, then," said the girl.

"When he jumped forward of you on the quarter-deck, you remember?"

"Yes, ves."

"We made a rush at him. His sword went through one man: he shot a second, his pistol beat down another, and then we closed on him—Francois stayed behind. He jerked a knife out of some bodys' hand and stabbed me, and then he bore us all across the deck, trying to the other alternative.

But what he would like was of no moment, for as he gasped out the word he went to another place where individual likes and dislikes no longer count.
Susan stared painfully at the figure, silent after that convulsive struggle which marked the end.
"He's dead," said Mornington quietly.
"Come away."
"Oh!" exclaimed the girl, suffering herself to be led from the cabin, "what horror of blood, what suffering, what horror of blood, what suffering, what horror of blood, what suffering, what murder, what loss of life, for one's ship!"
"And for one woman," said the lieutenant solemnly, looking fixedly at her.
